Taking photos – best practice

This handy cheat sheet will guide you through taking great photos to share on Facebook and Workplace.

1. Your images should tell a story – what are you doing to enable people to live later life well? This is what we want to show the world, here are some examples using afternoon tea, the image on the right is much more engaging showing a resident smiling and looking at the camera.

Where possible include a resident engaging in the activity, however if consent is not possible the first picture is fine.

Here's some more examples of great photos focusing on people living later life well

2. Check, check and check again! Please check your images before sending them to anyone to use or before posting on Facebook.

   Are they blurry? Do the residents look disengaged? Are there residents asleep in the background? Remove these ones.

3. Try to get a clear background – your image will be much more engaging with less distraction in the background.

4. Foreground is important too – is there anything in the way that you can move?

5. Utilise good lighting – try to avoid taking photos in darker areas. If the people in your images can stand next to, or facing a window, you'll get a better light. If the people in the photo stand directly in front of a window, they will be in shadow.